The Jamos' share more than just a little DNA with Klipsch Image S4s. They feature the same angled nozzle and a choice of rubber bungs, which are oval rather than perfectly round to ensure a better fit in the ear. The major difference is that the in40i's are fitted with an inline remote mic for apple devices. Jamo also produces the in30i, which shares the same dual magnet driver and earbud design as the in40, but not the remote.

A small nylon carry case is provided which makes them easy enough to carry around.

Sonically, the in40i's are something of a star performer. They are as easy the Klipsch S4's to make a good seal in the ear and equally comfortable, but boast a slightly brighter sound. This lends a bit of extra bite and drive to music, which we enjoyed tremendously.

Film soundtracks benefit from this too, gaining a little extra detail to their overall presentation. The Jamos are light and comfortable to wear and you'll find the remote control a particularly useful addition when you are out and about, as making and receiving calls is a simple business - not least because voices are easy to hear in the well sealed earphone.
